Promoting Happiness, Health and Quality of Life: The Role of Psychology, Technology and Environmental Sciences

Asian Association of Indigenous and Cultural Psychology,
Universiti Malaysia Perlis (UniMAP)
Langkawi Island, Malaysia
December 20-22, 2012

The purpose of the international seminar is to examine factors that promote happiness, health and quality of life and the contributions from psychology, technology and environmental sciences. With advances in technology, economy and environmental sciences, our lifestyle and health have changed significantly. These changes, however, need to be balanced with sustainable development and family, community and cultural integrity to promote happiness, health and quality of life since. The first goal of the international seminar is to understand factors that promote happiness, health and quality of life across cultures. The second goal is to examine how human thoughts, emotions and actions in local, cultural and global context promote happiness, health and quality of life. The third goal is to examine the role that technology and environmental sciences can play in improving our happiness, health and quality of life. The fourth goal is to examine the role that health sciences can play in promoting happiness, health and quality of life. The fifth goal is to examine the role education sciences can play in promoting happiness, health and quality of life. The conference will cover the following topics:

1. Research on happiness, health and quality of life.
2. Role of technology and environmental sciences in influencing our lifestyle.
3. Self, relationship, community and culture in promoting happiness and health.
4. Green economy, sustainable development, and quality of life.
5. Role of emotion in our life and emotional disorder.
6. Role of health sciences in promoting health and quality of life.
7. Role of educational sciences and health promotion.
