<開催趣旨>

This workshop in the University of Tokyo aims at framing the concept of “civic engagement” in the Japanese context by sharing knowledge and practices of social innovation both in the U.S. and Japan in which university and citizen are involved. Researchers in Japan now combine research with social problem solving to respond to the requests of the society (university’s social responsibility), but civic engagement, or education through civic engagement, has not been well linked to the cycle of research and problem solving. In order to develop civic engagement in Japan, we should start from framing the concept of “civic engagement” and make people understand its meaning in university’s research, education and problem solving.

In the first part of the workshop, distinguished practitioners are invited to have keynote speeches about their practices and ideas of civic engagement and social innovation. In the second part, a smaller workshop will be organized to deeply discuss the concept of “civic engagement”, the role of civic engagement in social innovation and the role of university in civic engagement and social innovation. This deliberative workshop invites practitioners of civic engagement and/or social innovation, researchers concerned with the issues, and most importantly, students that will initiate or get involved in civic engagement.
